

sequently is due much of such success in zoological work as I may subsequently have attained.

To my father, as will be readily understood, I owe far more than can well be put into words; and I will only express the hope that the following pages may be regarded as a not unworthy sequel to his many contributions to Invertebrate Zoology.

ETON COLLEGE, December 1884.